The Editor,
The New York Times
212 West 43rd Street
New York 36, N. Y.

Dear Sir:

If the Foreign Affairs column of Mr. C. L. Sulzberger (The New York Times, July 12, 1961) which proposes to legally recognize Russian absorption of the Baltic nations in exchange for new Soviet guarantees on West Berlin is a trial balloon, then this trial balloon could produce dire consequences.

First of all, this kind of a horse-trade would expose to the world the worth of declarations made by various United States agencies avowing that the United States would never acquiesce to Moscow's conquest of the enslaved and satellite nations of the USSR. It would not be surprising if Khrushchev took advantage of such proposals in order to further compromise the United States in the eyes of the subjected peoples, alleging that there was no other way out for them but to become reconciled with their present position and support Khrushchev's drive against the West.

Secondly, up to this time the West has been firm about the unquestioned legality of its position in Berlin. However, according to Mr. Sulzberger, it would appear that it was not so, since the continuation of the Berlin status must be purchased from Khrushchev and at a price named by him.

Thirdly, whence the assurance that if Khrushchev agreed to such a barter deal, he would not, at some time in the near future, again demand the right to absorb West Berlin? And what will the offer then have to be made in exchange?

Finally, the suggestion of Mr. Sulzberger comes precisely at a time when Khrushchev is using all available means to frighten the West into submission, and when, on the other hand, we hear from Washington of the need of a political and moral mobilization of the American people. How is it possible to effect a moral preparedness program of the people when they are simultaneously offered a prospect of a compromise with an enemy who openly predicts their eventual "burial"?

Yours very truly,

Myroslav Prokop
